YOU CAN MAKE MONEY EASY.

About three weeks ago I heard of a firm in Pennsylvania who manufacture dish washers, and I sent for one. It came all O.K., and after a most thorough trial on dishes, kettles, crocks, and all cooking utensils, I found it to be the most perfect invention ever made for housekeepers. I wash dishes every day for a family of eight, and never have to put my hands in the water. It works splendidly, and never cracks or breaks the dishes. All those who see it work are struck on it, and I am making lots of money selling them here in my neighborhood. They are easy to sell, and those who have received them are so well pleased. Any one can make from $25 to $50 a week selling them, and not have to work hard either. If those who want something to do will write to Dept. B7, of the Iron City Dish Washer Co., Sta. A, Pittsburg, Pa., they will receive full particulars regarding this dish washer and instructions how to sell it. A READER.

An Interesting Bit of History.

—Deep in the woods of Maryland, in the valley of the Antietam, surrounded by its majestic hills, there lived in the last century a man who, by the results of persevering study and scientific investigation, secured for himself the lasting gratitude of his own and following generations. While others were bent on measures of war during those revolutionary times, he was quietly following out a mission of "peace and good-will to men" by ministering to the wants of the sick and afflicted. Means of transportation in those early days were, of course, very meager, being limited, in the main, to travel on horseback—but even that form of transportation was denied to him of whom these few lines are written; for, when a boy, he had met with an accident which had caused a curvature of the spine, giving him the appearance of a "hunchback," hence he always traveled afoot. The distance from farm to farm and valley to valley was oftentimes very great; but distance had no horrors for him if he thought his help and skill were needed; hence it was that he became known not only in the section of Maryland where he lived at that time, but in parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia as well. The man of whom we write was old Dr. Peter Fahrney, the grandfather of the present doctor, who bears the same name. His life was not only devoted to scientific research, but he was also an active leader and a pillar in the church to which he belonged. It was these combined qualities of heart and mind which endeared him to the people, and which have actuated the descendants of those among whom he labored to now honor his memory as a man and citizen. With that end in view, the Fahrney Memorial Association was recently organized at San Mar, Md. It has secured control of the "old medical shop" which was used by him as office, laboratory, etc. It is yet in a fairly good state of preservation. This "shop" (as it was then called) is now to be enclosed by an iron fence and covered by a copper roof, so as to hereafter protect it from the ravages of the weather. Near the "shop" is the same water spring, bubbling up between the rocks as it did over 100 years ago, and which, even in those days, afforded weary travelers many a refreshing drink. This spring is now to be turned into a free, public fountain for the benefit of travelers along that highway—indeed, a most fitting commemoration of the life and services of one who so untriflingly ministered to both the physical and spiritual welfare of the people. It does not often happen that the memory of a man who lived such a quiet and unassuming existence, occupied as he was solely in the field of medical research, hoping thereby to benefit his fellow-men, is so highly revered by a fourth and fifth generation. One thing is certain, when, in this cold and prosaic age, a community makes such public recognition of a man's services and is willing to place itself to such expense in honoring his memory, so that future generations may also know about him, that man must have been above the ordinary, and his life and activity not in vain. So much in honor of the discoverer of DR. PETER'S BLOOD VITALIZER.
